Program

Supporting Psychological Health in First Responders grant program [1]

Description

Alberta's firefighters, police officers, paramedics, sheriffs, corrections officers and emergency health care workers often deal with stressful, dangerous and traumatic situations. This stress has a negative impact on first responders and emergency health care workers. They often experience post-traumatic stress injuries (PTSI) at significantly higher rates than the general population.

The Supporting Psychological Health in First Responders grant program has two separate funding streams, Stream 1 for Services and Stream 2 for Research

- Stream 2 (Research) provides funding to researchers engaged in applied research that generates evidence on prevention or intervention for first responders and emergency health care workers living with or at risk for PTSI.

Eligibility

Stream 2: Applied Research

The applied research grant recipients must meet these requirements:

- Be affiliated with a Canadian-based organization.
- Have the qualifications and appropriate expertise to conduct the proposed research
- Agree to provide data and reports outlined in the grant agreement

Funding Availability

For both funding streams (service and research) there is up to $1.5 million available for this grant program in 2020-21.
