Description

Funding will support clinical trials, observational studies, implementation science or other relevant study designs to scale-up promising existing projects, reorient current research, or initiate new rapid response research to address COVID-19 in the identified research areas that include understanding the safety, efficacy, effectiveness, ethics, and implementation of:

- vaccines, diagnostics, or therapeutics;
- clinical management and health system interventions; and
- social, policy, and public health responses and related indirect consequences.

Projects focused on scale-up or reorientation could include, but not be limited to, projects from the first COVID-19 rapid response competition [2], as well as efforts to amplify or adapt existing national and international clinical trials and related research networks and platforms. International collaborations and/or multi-site/multi-jurisdictional research is expected.

Proposals are encouraged to consider priority populations that may face unique contexts and/or challenges including:

- older adults
- children and their families

- homeless and underhoused populations
- populations living in institutional or communal settings (including long term care facilities)
- immunocompromised citizens and/or those living with serious chronic conditions
- those who face unintended systematic bias(es) within the healthcare system
- First Nations, Inuit and Métis communities
- populations living in remote settings
- refugees
- people in countries with weaker health systems

For research projects involving First Nations, Inuit and Métis Peoples: Appropriate consideration of TCPS 2: Chapter 9 - Research Involving the First Nations, Inuit and Métis Peoples of Canada [3], and demonstration of meaningful and culturally safe practices [4], plans and activities throughout the research project.
